Excerpt: . not to work at the millinery at night, and Nina passed the time while Polly was at the theatre in reading--and dreaming of the past. One night Polly asked her to go to the theatre to see Miss Tracey, who wanted a new hat, and insisted upon giving the instructions herself. We can't have her here; they'd all want to come. Nina hesitated, but at last consented. Behind the scenes is always somewhat awe-inspiring to the novice, and Nina made a nervous grab at Polly's hand as they passed among the forest of wings and back cloths to Miss Tracey's dressing room. That young lady was making up for the idiotic first piece; but, after a stare of something like surprise, she received Nina in the friendly hail-fellow-well-met fashion of the profession, and explained what it was she wanted. The call boy summoned her in the midst of her elaborate description. Don't go yet; wait till I come off again, Miss Wood, she said. Perhaps you'd like to go to the wings and see the play. I'll put it right with thy stage manager. She got the permission, and Nina went up and stood out of sight. She'd seen the play once too often; and instead of listening to the vapid dialogue she let her mind wander. It wandered in so strange a direction that she roused herself with a start. Well, silly...
