In five years they surveyed and delineated no less than 30,000 miles of coast. There is no branch of his Majesty's service more arduous in its nature or more important in its consequences than nautical surveying. As it requires abilities above the common, and is directly conducive to the safety of navigation, and consequent activity of commerce, so it is on both accounts peculiarly entitled to public encouragement. England, glorying in the victories of her navy, may also justly boast that in this department, --in the work of peace, --it is also pre-eminent. Other nations may maintain hydrographical establishments on a more liberal or splendid scale, and give to the claims of science a little of that consideration which British Parliaments bestow solely on pecuniary interests. But the enlightened liberality of a government cannot in such a case supply the place of practised seamanship...
